PROTECT IN-PERSON VISITING IN NEW YORK'S JAILS & PRISONS

The Protect In-Person Visiting bill (A4603/S5037) sponsored by Assemblymember Weprin and Senator Sepulveda would amend New York State Correction Law to proactively ensure that New York's jails and prisons cannot reduce or eliminate in-person visits in favor of video conferencing. This bill protects existing in-person visiting practices in New York State prisons and strengthens visiting practices in jails by requiring weekend and/or evening visiting hours so that children and families do not have to miss school or work to visit.

New York Must Protect In-Person Visiting Now

Families are justifiably fearful that correctional facilities in New York will eliminate or reduce visiting hours in favor of fee-based video conferencing, an alarming trend occurring in jails across the country and encouraged by video conferencing companies and jails that profit from it.¹ California, Illinois, and Massachusetts passed laws to protect in-person visiting and legislation is pending in more jurisdictions. It is prudent for New York to pass legislation to protect in-person visits: it is easier to prevent this alarming practice than to reverse it.

Video Conferencing is Not Accessible for All Families

Jails typically charge between $5 to $15 for a 30 minute video conference.² Some of New York's jails, including Rikers Island, offer free "televisits" but most jails charge a fee. Only the Osborne Association and the Brooklyn Public Library offer free, family-friendly video "visits" at 21 of New York's 42 prisons. Families may not have access to or struggle with using the technology required for video conferencing. Families report the video and sound is often poor or ends prematurely.³

Video conferencing is a good supplement to in-person visits, but should never replace being able to see someone in person. Video conferencing should be free and available in all of New York's prisons and jails, allowing families to maintain relationships in between in-person visits.

In-Person Visiting Supports Children's Well-Being

Visiting is critically important for families, and especially for children. The Children of Incarcerated Parents' Bill of Rights states "I have the right to speak with, see, and touch my parent."⁴ Families rely on in-person visits for important parent-child conversations, to build and maintain bonds, and reassure children that their parents are safe and healthy. Visiting can decrease children's emotional distress; provide a forum to process trauma surrounding the separation; and can lead to a smoother reentry process.

Children tell us: "When I was younger I thought my mom didn't want to see me because I was only able to video visit with her. I didn't understand that I wasn't visiting in-person because of limited visiting hours and distance." And, "As long as I can visit my mom, feel her touch, and can eat with her, that's all that matters."

In-Person Visiting Promotes Public Safety

Research demonstrates that maintaining and strengthening family and community ties is critical to preventing recidivism and promoting lasting reentry. Visiting also supports institutional adjustment, program participation, and rehabilitation for those incarcerated. It is unknown whether video conferencing alone will lead to these benefits. Reports of behavior incidents and contraband increased within the year after the jail in Travis County, Texas completely replaced in-person visiting with video conferencing.⁵

There is Nothing Like Seeing a Loved One In-Person

More than 105,000 children whose parents are incarcerated in New York and hundreds of thousands of family members are counting on the immediate passage of this bill to protect the critical lifeline to their loved ones. As a result of systemic racism and criminalizing poverty, families of color and low income families are disproportionately affected by incarceration making restoring, strengthening and protecting visiting a matter of racial and economic justice. And to put it simply, protecting in-person visiting is the right thing to do.
